Agricultural Heritage

THE SOUTH MOUNTAIN REGION is a unique landscape encompassing Cumberland, Franklin, Adams and York counties. The region's most prominent geographic feature is the forested slopes of the mountain ridgeline, but the fertile valleys, rolling foothills and scenic waterways help define the landscape and shape a rich agricultural heritage. From the time of the Native Americans to the modern era, the South Mountain region has provided important agricultural and recreational resources.

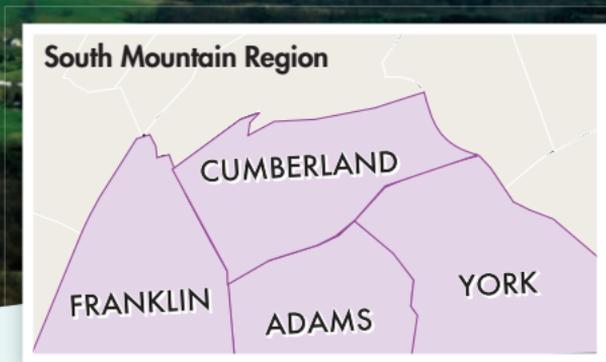

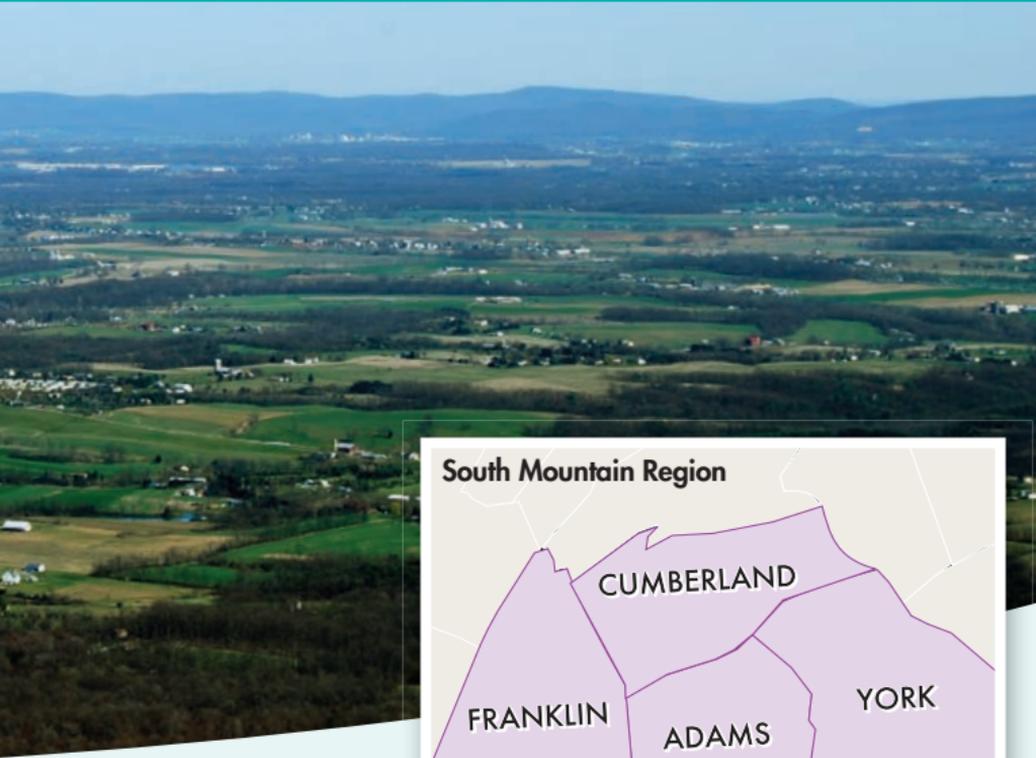

Native Americans were the first human inhabitants of the South Mountain region and the Cumberland Valley. They lived and camped along the area's streams, used minerals and rocks in the mountain formations for tools and weapons and cultivated crops in the fertile soils of the valleys.

In the early to mid-1700s, the South Mountain region saw European settlements by the Scotch-Irish and Germans. Like the Native Americans before them, the Europeans settled in the fertile valleys near the region's springs and creeks. European settlers brought farming methods from their home countries but also were introduced to native crops such as corn, beans, peas, squash and melons by the Native Americans.

Early farms in the South Mountain region produced crops and goods for their own consumption and for selling and trading to both local and distant markets. Despite the rich limestone soils, farmers found that planting the same crops in the same area repeatedly exhausted the soils. These challenges lead to the advent of rotating crops among the fields and enriching the soils with lime and other organics, including manure from livestock. The crop-and-livestock system proved to be an efficient farm model providing a more diverse array of products and enriching the soils. In addition to growing grain, grass and vegetable crops, farmers also planted apple orchards. Adams County especially, had the right combination of landform and soils to excel at fruit production.

Agricultural Heritage

The principal crops grown by Cumberland Valley farmers during the nineteenth century included wheat, corn, oats and hay, supplemented in smaller numbers by other grains, grasses and produce. As part of the newly adopted crop-and-livestock system, livestock in the valley includes cattle, horses and swine. By the mid-nineteenth century, several fruit nurseries had been established in Adams County with apple orchards as well as peach, pear, cherry and other types of fruit trees. The development of the transportation network in the late 1800s provided a way to distribute the fruit to local and regional markets.

Farming in the twentieth century was transformative. Farmers in the Cumberland Valley focused on dairying, poultry farming and growing wheat, corn, alfalfa, oats and hay crops. Modernization and specialty production transformed agriculture into a more complex business. During this period, dairying was subject to new sanitation requirements so modification of the nineteenth century barns and construction of milk houses was necessary to comply with the regulations. Poultry farms also rose to a more prominent place in the farm economy. By the middle decades of the twentieth century, urban sprawl was encroaching on agricultural land throughout the South Mountain region. Farms were reduced in number but enlarged in size as small scale operations could no longer compete.

Today, agriculture remains a prominent feature of the landscape and an important part of the South Mountain region heritage. The countryside contains a mix of historic and modern agricultural buildings and the industry thrives as a statewide leader in the fruit, cattle and dairy industries.

Local Food

The South Mountain region is home to some of the finest agricultural land in Pennsylvania and is celebrated for its agricultural products. In fact, the majority of the Cumberland Valley's soils are classified as "prime" (high quality) or soils of statewide importance. Adams County is ranked #1 in Pennsylvania for fruits, nuts and berries, while York County is #2 statewide for grains and beans. Franklin County also tops the list at #2 statewide for dairy and #3 for fruits, nuts and berries. Cumberland County is renowned for cattle and dairy industries at #5 and #7 respectively statewide.

South Mountain Fast Facts
